|           |         |                  |              | variables the experimental research design must be carried out in a controlled environment throughout the experiment the researcher collects data that can support or refute a hypothesis thus this research is also referred to as hypothesis testing or a deductive research method the key aspects of experimental research there are various attributes that are formative of and unique to experimental research in addition to its main purpose understanding these is key to understanding this kind of research in-depth and what to expect when performing it the following enumerates the defining characteristics of this kind of research it includes a hypothesis a variable that will be manipulated by the researcher along with the variable that will be measured and compared the data in this research must be able to be quantified the observation of the subjects however must be executed qualitatively it can be conducted in a laboratory in field settings i e field research the latter is rarer as it is difficult to manipulate treatments and to control external occurrences in a live setting it relies on making comparisons between two or more groups the variables some variables are given an experimental stimulus called a treatment this is the treatment group the variables that do not receive a stimulus are known as the control group first researchers must consider how the variables are related and only afterward can they move on to making predictions that can be tested time is a crucial component when putting forth a cause-and-effect relationship there 3 types of experimental research pre-experimental research design true experimental research design quasi-experimental research design the three types of experimental research experimental research encompasses three subtypes that researchers can implement they all fall under experimental research differing in how the subjects are classified they can be classified based on their conditions or groups |                                                                           |
